

EURIPIDES' HERACLES: THE KATABASIS-MOTIF REVISITED

Practices and motifs in Greek myth, cult, and literature are suggestive of the Greeks' profound and vigorous concern with ideas about the afterlife – the journey of the soul to the nether realm, the status of the dead, the geography of the Underworld, the quality of postmortem life, the power of the infernal gods, and so on. In fact, hero-cult, necromancy, spontaneous ghost apparitions, tomb visits, the use of curse tablets, lamellae, magical texts, and figurines – whether reflecting real-life phenomena or whether being products of creative imagination – show that the Greeks sought to maintain a constant communication with the dead and tended to challenge the impermeability of the boundaries between the upper and the lower world. The journey of the living to the Underworld, the so-called katabasis, is one of the most powerful expressions of this tendency.¹

Based on a simple and basic story, that of the movement between worlds, katabasis features in the saga of some of the greatest heroes and gods; Odysseus, Heracles, Theseus, Pirithous, Orpheus, Dionysus, and Persephone dare to cross the barrier that separates the two spheres, descend into Hades, and pay a visit to the dead. In all its occurrences in myth, literature, and cult, the infernal descent carries multifarious significations and takes different forms depending on the context in which it appears. Even within the saga of the same hero the narrative constantly evolves and becomes subject to competitive variations, leaving room for diverse, often conflicting interpretations; it can be perceived as an exceptional proof of heroism, a victory over death, a spiritual journey toward knowledge, a symbolic regeneration of one's self, a symbolic expression of a promising eschatological message, a verification of the invincibility of death, or even an aetiological explanation for the life-cycle of vegetation.²

Martínez, 'The katábasis of the hero', in V. Pirenne-Delforge and E. Suárez de la Torre (edd.), Héros et héroïnes dans les mythes et les cultes grecs: Actes du Colloque organisé à l'Université de Valladolid du 26 au 29 mai 1999 (Liège, 2000), 67-78.

It is to no surprise that this traditional malleable motif has attracted the attention of fifth-century dramatists. Tragic and, particularly, comic poets repeatedly thematise katabasis and use it as a creative device whereby they reflect their themes or even structure their plays. For instance, in the fragmentary Pirithous the infernal descent of Heracles constitutes the spinal episode of the plot and triggers the subsequent rescue of two other katabatic heroes – Theseus and Pirithous.³ Some repercussions of the katabatic tradition can also be traced in Euripides' Alcestis; not only is there a clear reference to Orpheus' infernal descent (E. Alc. 357-362), but the encounter between

² Clark (n. 1), 16 points out that, especially in oriental narratives, the katabatic pattern is accompanied by the death and rebirth of nature and is thus connected with the notion of fertility. This applies particularly to divine individuals.

³ Scholars attribute the play either to Critias or to Euripides. For a detailed analysis of the debate see C. Collard, 'The Pirithous Fragments', in J.A. López Férez (ed.), De Homero a Libanio (Madrid, 1995), 183-93. I myself regard this play as typically Euripidean; see the convincing arguments of Collard (n. 3), 187-91, who underlines the similarities of Pirithous with the typical Euripidean plays in terms of plot, theme, metre, language, and style. See also S. Mills, Theseus, Tragedy and the Athenian Empire (Oxford, 1997), 257-62. A strong element in favour of Euripidean authorship is the fact that parts of this play survive in two papyri (P.Oxy. 2078 and 3531); rarely are Oxyrhynchus tragic texts attributed to anyone else but the three great tragedians. The date of the play is uncertain.

Heracles and Charon that leads to the rescue of Alcestis from death may be read in katabatic terms. Noteworthy is the fact that Odysseus' semi-katabatic/semi-necromantic experience in Odyssey 11 becomes a source of inspiration for Aeschylus' fragmentary Psychagogoi (fr. 273-278) – even though the episode is there treated as purely necromantic. In comedy, on the other hand, katabasis is far more common. Apart from its prominent treatment in Aristophanes' Frogs, it seems to occur in various fragmentary plays, such as Eupolis' Demoi, Aristophanes' Gerytades, and Pherecrates' Metalleis and Crapataloi.

It is perhaps oxymoronic that the focus of a paper dealing with the dramatic katabasis is placed on a play where katabasis is not actually dramatised – Euripides' Heracles. Here, the narrative of the infernal descent remains part of the offstage events and by no means functions as the driving force of the action the way it does in Euripides' Pirithous or in Aristophanes' Frogs. When the play begins, Heracles is absent, preoccupied with bringing Cerberus up to earth, and, when he finally appears on the stage, he has already executed his infernal labour with success. But does this mean that the katabatic motif is incidental and peripheral to the dramatic meaning? Otherwise put, does it serve as a mere, yet credible, excuse whereby Euripides manages to keep Heracles away from his family and leave the latter exposed to Lycus' threats? A closer reading of the text will lead us to an observation that has so far failed to attract the attention of scholars; far from being a mechanical plot device, the katabasis contributes to the more emphatic articulation of the theme of life and death and becomes one of the several means whereby the alternative sides of Heracles, which correspond to two different definitions of heroism, are brought to a sharper focus. In the first part of the plot, Heracles' mythical descent is presented as his top achievement and the ultimate proof of his power. It is a literal encounter with the Underworld whose successful outcome signals the hero's victory over death. Things are reversed in the second part. Heracles is transformed into a weak man and undergoes a virtual death. The hero's plight takes the wrappings of a second encounter with death that is often presented in the form of a symbolic katabasis, which is now performed by Heracles the man rather than Heracles the mythical hero. This second deathlike experience will also result in a return to life, which will now be achieved with the help of Theseus and through the bonds of philia. In other words, Euripides uses the katabasis-motif in order to articulate a core idea of his play – Heracles' gradual transition from an all-powerful hero to a weak ordinary man.

KATABASIS AS PROOF OF HEROISM

In the first part of the play, Heracles' katabasis is recurrently mentioned by Amphytrion, Megara, Lycus, and the chorus,⁴ and becomes the hallmark of the hero's extraordinary power. Although the task involves two challenges, namely the journey itself to the Underworld and the capture of Cerberus, Euripides emphasises the former, showing his interest in the element of spatial dislocation that the labour entails.⁵ Indeed, in the long laudatory account of the hero's past achievements (348-435), the geographical coordinates of his last mission are of central importance; the episode is introduced as a sailing to Hades without any reference to the fetching of Cerberus (425-9). This insistence on the spatial aspect of the labour is not coincidental; it highlights the degree of difficulty it involves and, most importantly, it contributes to the articulation of the hero's liminality during his sojourn in the Underworld.⁶

In fact, as long as he is in the Underworld, the Euripidean Heracles experiences spatial as well as ontological liminality. His spatial displacement is obvious; the hero is outside human society altogether, asserting a place in the realm of the dead. Moreover, the question of whether Heracles is alive or dead repeatedly crops up during his absence, something that in turn reflects the inherent ambiguity of Hades as place and state of existence.⁷ Lycus, for instance, asserts with conviction that there is no return from Hades (145-6; cf. 718) and refers to Heracles as ὁ κατθανών (245-6). Megara, who abandons every hope and is ready to surrender, mourns her husband as dead (117-8; cf. 462) and reminds Amphytrion that none of the deceased has ever returned from Hades (296-7). Amphytrion adopts a more optimistic viewpoint; although he states that his son is beneath the earth and has not come back yet (22-5, 37, 45-6), he still hopes for his return (95-7). Yet, later on, his advice to continue propitiating the powers below reinforces the idea that Heracles is dead – even though he hopes that he is a powerful dead with the capability of intervening in earthly affairs. The chorus epitomises the ambiguous state of Heracles by raising two mutually exclusive prospects – his potential arrival (262-3) and his potential death (266-7, 425-9; cf. 348-450). Admittedly, the latter possibility is stronger and is accorded greater emphasis.

⁶ Heracles' liminal state in this play is also noted by T. Papadopoulou (Heracles and Euripidean Tragedy (Cambridge, 2005), 30-1), but not in association with his katabasis.

A third scenario is raised by Megara (490-6) who, taking for granted that her husband is dead, encourages him to appear in the guise of a shadow (σκιά, 494) or even a dream (ὄναρ, 495):

ὦ φίλτατ', εἴ τις φθόγγος εἰσακούεται
θνητῶν παρ' Ἄιδῃ, σοὶ τάδ', Ἡράκλεις, λέγω· θνήσκει πατὴρ σὸς καὶ τέκν', ὄλλυμαι δ' ἐγώ, ἢ πρὶν μακαρία διὰ σ' ἐκκληζόμεν βροτοῖς.
ἄρηξον, ἐλθέ· καὶ σκιά φάνηθί μοι.
ἄλῃς γὰρ ἐλθὼν κἄν ὄναρ γένοιο σύ·
κακοὶ γάρ εἰσιν οἱ τέκνα κτείνουσι σά.

The traditional association between dreams and the dead,⁸ combined with famous examples of tragic revenants, such as Darius and Clytaemestra in Aeschylus' Persae and Eumenides, and Polydorus and Achilles in Euripides' Hecuba, underlie Megara's exhortations and make the scenario of Heracles' arrival as a 'living corpse' possible. It is not a coincidence that Megara's invocation is modeled on tragic speeches that aim at engaging the help of a dead character;⁹ especially, the verbal correspondences between the tricolon ἄρηξον, ἐλθέ· φάνηθι and the successive imperatives ἴθι, ἴκοῦ, ἐλθέ that the chorus addresses to the dead Darius in Aeschylus' Persae (658-9) point to Heracles' indeterminate status, as this occult phrasing of necromancy invites a connection between Heracles and the dead Darius – the oldest surviving dramatic expression of the revenant-motif. At the same time, Megara's wish functions as a prelude for the status of the hero after the infanticide, when he registers features of a living corpse.¹⁰ This is also how his arrival in the first part of the play is about to be interpreted (516-8).

At this point, it should be noted that katabasis, as approached by mystery cults, not only "legitimizes" but also foregrounds the liminal status of Euripides' Heracles. According to the ritual reading of the motif, the sojourn in Hades corresponds to liminality, the second stage of van Gennep's initiatory pattern, the two other being separation and re-aggregation.¹¹ Such a reading is at home in this play, as Euripides plays with mystic and ritual elements, such as the idea of Heracles as bacchos (1119, 1142) and the "Eleusinised" version of his infernal journey (613).¹²

Given that the katabasis is established from the outset as something extremely dangerous which should normally bring about Heracles' death, his unexpected return proves that the hero has reached the extreme limit of human potential. The growth of his achievement is variously highlighted. First of all, his return remedies his spatial liminality and reintegrates him into the Theban society. As the chorus formulates it, "the new king [Lycus] has gone and the old one reigns, having left behind the harbour of Acheron" (769-70; cf. 809-10). Also, his anodos, described as it is in terms of a return to light (524),¹³ is equivalent to a rebirth into a new status. In reality, it reflects the extreme power of Heracles and raises the question of what he really is; he is evidently something more than an ordinary man. It is not a coincidence that after his return from Hades his divine origin is given a considerable degree of emphasis.¹⁴ He is raised to the level of Zeus Soter (521-2), he is emphatically called son of Zeus (Διὸς ὁ παῖς, 696), and in rescuing his family he achieves what Zeus has patently failed to achieve. In the second stasimon, the chorus draws an explicit parallelism between Heracles and Apollo; just as the Delian maidens sing a paean to Apollo, so do the old choreutai in honour of Heracles (687-700).¹⁵ A few lines before, the chorus sings a glorious hymn both for Heracles and for Dionysus, associating the two figures in a context of festive celebration (673-87).¹⁶ As well as corroborating his divine origin, his return also validates his heroic valour; the adjective καλλίνικος, a term that belongs to

On the other hand, M.W. Padilla ('Heroic Paternity in Euripides' Heracles', Arethusa 27 (1994), 279-302), analyses Heracles' attitude on the basis of the destructive association between heroism and paternity.

the language of athletic victory, is repeatedly employed in association with him (570, 582, 681, 769), his arête exceeds his divine birth (696-700), and his successful katabasis proves his ἀλκή (805-8).

In all of this Euripides makes use of the traditional interpretation of katabasis as a victory over death, an idea enclosed in a range of other mythical labours of Heracles, such as his fight with Geras, his wrestling with Thanatos over Alcestis, his encounter with the Old man of the sea, the stealing of the apples of Hesperides and Geryon's cattle, and his marriage to Hebe.¹⁷ Heracles conquers death not in the sense that he has become immortal, but in the sense that, like Sisyphus, he achieves the impossible by coming back from the realm of the dead. The rhetoric he uses points to the same direction. His question τῶν δ' ἐμῶν τέκνων οὐκ ἐκπονήσω θάνατον,¹⁸ (580-1) enshrines the idea of a combat with death. As Gibert notes, Thanatos here is not simply an event or an experience, but also a personified opponent, whom Heracles will "labour to avert”.¹⁹ It is in this larger spirit of a conquest of death that the chorus’ references to a second youth need to be interpreted.

KATABASIS AND THE THEME OF LIFE AND DEATH

However, the use of katabasis to present Heracles as an extreme form of heroism is only part of the story. It also brings into the play the theme of life and death and triggers the transition of Heracles’ family from a symbolic death to a symbolic rebirth. As long as the absent Heracles experiences a deathlike experience in the Underworld, his family undergoes a similar virtual death on the stage. Once again, this literary use of katabasis as a means of reflecting upon the notions of life, death, and rebirth is paralleled by the ritual reading of the motif as the death and rebirth of the initiate into a new status.²⁰ For instance, in the context of the Eleusinian Mysteries, the perpetual movement of Persephone from the earth to the Underworld and vice versa not only exemplifies the life cycle of nature (cf. h. Cer. 471-473), but it also imitates the pattern of death and rebirth involved in two important rites of passage that an Eleusinian initiate must undergo – the initiation into the mysteries and the transition to a postmortem life.

¹⁹ Gibert (n. 17), 255-8.

On the death-rebirth pattern in ritual see also Plu. fr. 178 Sandbach; Pherecyd. Syr. 7 B 6 D-K.

The former is perceived as a symbolic death and rebirth of the initiate into the new status of mystes,²¹ while the latter involves a biological death that leads to a new, privileged existence in the Underworld. The three events – katabasis, Eleusinian initiation, biological death – are interrelated to the extent that they involve the stages of a ritual initiation, as defined by Van Gennep. It is not a coincidence that Persephone's descent was in all likelihood mimetically performed during the mysteries.²²

To turn back to Euripides' play, the liminal conditions attached to the hero as a consequence of his sojourn in the infernal realm characterise his family as well. Amphitryon, Megara, and the children are completely isolated and cut off from human society.²³ They can move neither within the city of Thebes nor outside it. Just as Heracles cannot return γαίᾱς ὕπο (296), so his family is unable to cross γαίᾱς ὄρια (82), for powerful guards protect the gates. Apparently, Lycus is in control of the geographical territory. Even exile is not a promising option for the children (302-6). The fact that the family is also banned from its physical space, namely the house (53-4), reflects the anomaly of the situation. The only place left for them is the altar of Zeus Soter. The problematic spatial position of the family is enhanced by the lack of friends

²³ See R. Rehm, 'The Play of Space: Before, Behind, and Beyond in Euripides' Heracles', Illinois Classical Studies 24-5 (1999/2000), 363-75, at 365-6.

(55-9, 84-5, 222-8, 551, 558-61), a fact that seals their alienation from any kind of reciprocal social liaison. Clearly, the family lives in a virtual Underworld with no food, drink, clothing, or friends (51-9).

The attitude of the family is also indicative of their contact with death. To talk about or contemplate death in a critical moment may be a commonplace in Greek tragedy, but to make funerary preparations while still alive is much less usual. The adornment of the children with funeral garments is emphatically presented, as it preoccupies all the onstage characters; it is prepared by Megara (329-31), permitted by Lycus (332-5; cf. 702-703), pointed out by the chorus (442-3), and persistently commented on by Heracles (525-6, 548-9, 562-4). This oxymoronic image of the living actors dressed up like corpses must have had a strong theatrical impression on the audience²⁴ and certainly functions as a reminder of the anomalous status of the family,²⁵ as well as a visual representation of the state of Heracles in Hades. Like the initiands in mystic transitions, the children undergo a deathlike experience, which is symbolised by their funeral garments.²⁶ This in turn prefigures their literal death. The deathlike experience of the family climaxes in Megara's speech in lines 451-96, where she views the whole family as a mixed group of corpses and looks for the sacrificer who will send the sacrificial victims to the house of Hades (451-5). Also, in an impressive

²⁶ The clothes of the Eleusinian initiates were probably regarded as funerary and were dedicated to Demeter after the completion of the ceremony. See K.J. metaphorical image, she makes use of the marriage-to-death motif and conceives their present plight as a perverted nuptial ceremony (480-4).²⁷ Besides, images like Charon and his oar lying in prospect for the children, the path with no return (430-4), and the idea of sending one to the world below (335, 453), give the impression that the children are about to reduplicate their father's infernal journey. What the family suffers is presented as a consequence of Heracles' absence in a way that the deathlike experience of the former is contingent on the latter's katabasis.²⁸ In fact, the chorus visualises the infernal journey of the children right after Heracles' own (425-35), as though they are causally related. Not surprisingly, Megara perceives the funeral garments of the children as the only patrimony from the house of their father (331).

The family's deathlike experience is reversed when Heracles returns from the Underworld. This idea rests on the rehabilitative power of the katabatic motif that is intrinsic not only to its ritual readings, but also to some of its mythical expressions; for instance, Orpheus and Dionysus descend to the Underworld with the aim of reviving beloved persons (Eurydice and Semele, respectively), Heracles manages to restore Theseus to the world of the living, and Persephone by means of her anodos effectuates the renewal of nature. Similarly, the anodos of Euripides' Heracles signals the rescue of his relatives and their symbolic return to life. Indeed, Heracles is welcomed as a light for his family (ὦ φάος μολών, 531),²⁹ which has so far encountered the darkness of a virtual Underworld. The hero encourages his children to unveil their heads, tear the funeral garments, and gaze at the light, alluding to their transition from death to rebirth (562-4):

οὐ ρίψεθ' Ἄιδου τάσδε περιβολὰς κόμης
καὶ φῶς ἀναβλέψεσθε, τοῦ κάτω σκότου
φίλας ἀμοιβὰς ὅμμασιν δεδορκότες;

These acts are reminiscent of ritual ceremonies that involve mystic transitions to a new status. In this respect, Heracles undertakes the role of a hierophant, who assists and brings to pass the initiatory ceremony. This is not alien to the cultic persona of the hero, who played an important role in initiatory rituals associated with age transition.³⁰ Relevant here is also the ritual interpretation of his mythical katabasis in the context of the Eleusinian Mysteries. According to the "Eleusinised" version of the episode,

²⁹ Agamemnon and Orestes receive a similar reception in A. Ag. 601 and S. El. 1224 respectively. Seaford (n. 12), 377-8, discussing the latter play and HF, argues that this motif applies to a hero that is thought to be dead, but unexpectedly returns to save his kin. See also Papadopoulou (n. 6), 52.

Jourdain-Annequin, 'À propos d'un rituel pour Iolaos à Agyrion: Héraclès et l'initiation des jeunes gens', in L'initiation: actes du colloque international de Montpellier, 11-14 avril 1991, I: Les rites d'adolescence et les mystères (Montpellier, 1992), 121-41; E.M. Griffiths, Euripides' Heracles (London, 2006), 25.

Heracles becomes the first to be initiated into the Mysteries at Eleusis before his descent.³¹ In such ritual surroundings, the hero's katabasis is raised to the level of a paradigmatic act that encapsulates the promising eschatological message of Eleusis, namely the symbolic conquest of death.³² Once again, Euripides makes a creative use of the existing cultic associations of the katabasis-motif with the notion of death and rebirth; in this light, the presentation of the Euripidean Heracles as a mediator in the life/death continuum and as a man who can contribute to the virtual rebirth of his family is endowed with religious authority.

Interestingly, the chorus sympathises with the family and participates in its deathlike experience and subsequent rebirth. The choral odes are full of references to the idea of physical decadence owing to old age, a feature that qualifies Amphytrion as well.³³ They introduce themselves as ἔπεα μόνον καὶ δόκημα νυκτερῶ- / πόν ἐννύχων ὀνειρώων (112-3), foreshadowing the dream-like ontological status of the katabatic Heracles (495, 517-8) and pinpointing the kinship between old age and death. On the contrary, Heracles' return allows them to experience a second youth. νεότης is praised in the second stasimon (637-54) and becomes the topic of the stanza that follows (655-72). Once Lycus is killed, the chorus participates more actively in the surrounding spirit of rebirth by engaging in a festive dance that suggests a sort of rejuvenation (760-814). Their references to the crown (677, 781) allude to a return to life, for in a ritual context the garland is worn after the completion of the initiation process.³⁴ Here it decorates both the Chorus and river Ismenus, suggesting an extension of the regenerative effects of Heracles' anodos to the whole city.

DEATH RESURGENT

But here too we are not at an end. After the sequence of death and rebirth, the theme of death reappears. This time the notion is initiated by the portrayal of Lyssa and is further illuminated in the event of infanticide, before being associated with Heracles himself. In her Euripidean profile, Lyssa works as representative of destructive infernal forces.³⁵ Her prominently infernal attributes are mainly owed to her resemblances with the Aeschylean Erinyes,³⁶ her affiliation with Night, and her designation as Νυκτός

³⁵ On Lyssa in Greek Tragedy see e.g. A. Cho. 287, Pr. 883, [Xantriai] fr. 169 (if we read with Lobeck Λύσσης instead of γλώσσης); S. fr. 941 (incert.); E. Ba. 977, 981. Euripides however is the first to stage this figure (see J. Duchemin, 'Lyssa dans l'Héraclès Furieux d' Euripide', REG 80 (1967), 130-9 with references to passages and vases related to the figure of Lyssa).

Γοργών (883). This idea is further stressed when the maddened Heracles is made to call forth the Tartarian Keres, the spirits of death (870), and when the effects of Lyssa's activities on the house are defined as τάραγμα ταρτάρειον (908).³⁷ When Lyssa invades Heracles she is actually identified with him in a way that his actions and thoughts are not independent of her.³⁸ That he is now controlled by a deathly power is also implied by the fact that madness affects first his vision.³⁹ Hallucinations, deceptive

³⁸ See M.O. Lee, 'The Iris-Lyssa Scene', Antichthon 16 (1982), 44-53, at 48-9, who also points out that Lyssa is identified with her victim on a fifth-century Attic red-figured vase (on which see A.D. Trendall & T.B.L. Webster, Illustrations of Greek Drama (London, 1971), 62. On how madness ties with the circular patterns of ἐλίσσω, στρέφω, and χορεύω in this play see Worman (n. 24), 100-1.

³⁹ On vision in this play see Griffiths (n. 30), 59-61. On Heracles' madness and the scholarly discussions concerning its nature see K. Riley, The reception and performance of Euripides' Heracles: reasoning madness (Oxford, 2008). Heracles' madness is an exclusive product of divine intervention (so also J.-A. Shelton, 'Structural Unity in Euripides' Hercules Furens', Eranos 77 (1979), 101-10, at 106), not something caused by the hero himself. Contrast U. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, Euripides: Herakles, vols. 3 (Berlin, 1895), at 2.128-9). Its cause has been traced in Heracles' glorious achievements (Lee (n. 38), 51-3), the capture of Cerberus (Shelton (n. 39), 105; E.M. Griffiths, 'Euripides Heracles and the Pursuit of Immortality', Mnemosyne 55 (2002), 641-56), the murder of Lycus (Seaford (n. 12), 380), and his interstitial nature between mortal and divine (Silk (n. 14), 17-8). Yet, I do not think that Hera's anger needs any justification; she has long been intending to harm the hero and now that the labours sight, and optical disorientation are the main symptoms of his affliction. Within the context of a broader contrasting alternation between light and darkness in the play, the distorted vision is expected to be seen as akin to the underworldly darkness. Death in the guise of Lyssa controls him, invades him, and transforms him into his instrument, bringing about one more, now definite, katabasis – that of his family. The prevalence of the infernal forces is corroborated by the Chorus, who abandons the discourse on youth and Heracles' arête for the song of Hades (1025-7):

αἰᾶ, τίνα στεναγμὸν
ἢ γόον ἢ φθιτῶν ὠιδᾶν ἢ τίν' Ἄι-
δα χορὸν ἀχήσω;

Amphitryon will recognise in this fit of madness the workings of an infernal force like the one that avenges the murdered dead, for he will ask his son whether he is driven by the blood of the men he has killed (966-7) and will then compare him to a bacchant of Hades (1119).

Noteworthy is the fact that the murder of the children is described in a language that recalls the katabatic motif. As Iris puts it, Heracles will send τὸν καλλίπαιδα στέφανον across the strait of Acheron with his own murderous hand (838-9).⁴⁰ The expression actually subverts the idea of Heracles' victorious crown (στεφάνωμα are completed she finds the opportunity to accomplish her plans (cf. HF 827-32) (so Gregory (n. 14), 267-8; Bond (n. 9), xxiv-xxvi).

μόχθων, 355-6) and his designation as καλλίνικος.⁴¹ The previous symbolic rebirth of the family now gives way to an experience that takes on the nature of a katabasis pattern. The katabasis he will contrive for his children will ironically constitute another labour, but of a different kind (cf. τὸν λοίσθιον δὲ τόνδ' ἔτλην τάλας πόνον, / παιδοκτονήσας δῶμα θριγκῶσαι κακοῖς, 1279-80). Heracles' heroic and domestic images are confused.⁴² Imaginary chariots, enemies, and open-air fights subvert the idea of Heracles the fighter, who is now declared καλλίνικος over no one (959-62).⁴³ Characteristically, the bow is transformed from an instrument of glorious achievements to an instrument of kindred death.⁴⁴ Heracles will later on consider the idea of keeping his weapons, commenting on their double function (1376-85). In view of his ruinous acts, his previous question τῶν δ' ἐμῶν τέκνων / οὐκ ἐκπονήσω θάνατον; (580-1) obtains a different dimension; Heracles does not "labour to avert" his children's death, but rather "labour to accomplish" it.

All in all, right before the second entrance of Heracles Euripides undermines the extraordinary kind of heroism with which he credits Heracles in the first part of the play. By means of his katabasis he may have exceeded by far the potential of the ordinary man and reached the extreme level of human achievement, but in so doing he has (as we realise when Lyssa enters) placed himself in a dangerous position. The notion of death, as re-introduced by Lyssa's entrance and the subsequent infanticide, reverses his achievement, questions his victory over death, and prepares for the revelation of his weak side in the second part of the play.⁴⁵ Euripides, therefore, raises through Heracles the traditional Greek theme of mortal limitation; by stretching the boundaries, some people are ultimately destroyed and serve as examples that define the boundaries for us. The unpredictability of the divine and the weakness that is inherent to man will eventually reinforce the human need for friendship.

HERACLES' NEW CONTACT WITH DEATH

In the action that follows the massive killings of Lycus and Heracles' family, the hero undergoes once again a virtual death, which sometimes takes on the wrappings of a katabasis. The ekkuklema is wheeled out carrying the sleeping hero and his murdered family and transforming the stage into a virtual Hades.⁴⁶ The presence of the corpses is recurrently pointed out.⁴⁷ Most importantly, Heracles is presented among them (1189) and is lamented together with them, as though he too is dead (1045-6, 1064-6).⁴⁸ Even when he regains his senses, the hero continues to register features of a living corpse in an onstage Underworld. He points out that he has dead bodies as neighbours (1097) and he initially identifies the place with Hades, wondering whether he has performed a katabasis once again (1101-4):

⁴⁵ Cf. Silk (n. 14), 12-9.

⁴⁷ See e.g. HF 1032-3, 1051-2, 1097, 1031, 1172, 1189. As Z. Petre, 'La représentation de la mort dans la tragédie grecque', StudClas 23 (1985), 21-35, at 23-5, points out, the bloody corpses of the children encapsulate all the previous references to death in this play.

οὐ που κατῆλθον αὔθις εἰς Ἅιδου πάλιν, Εὐρυσθέως δίαυλον ἐξ Ἅιδου μολών;
ἀλλ' οὔτε Σισύφειον εἰσορῶ πέτρον
Πλούτωνά τ' οὐδὲ σκῆπτρα Δήμητρος κόρης.
ἔκ τοι πέπληγμαι ποῦ ποτ' ὦν ἀμηχανῶ;

Moreover, his train of thought and the way he chooses to express his misfortunes are deeply influenced by his previous katabatic experience. The hero wishes to return to the Underworld from where he has just come (1247), imagines himself suffering in a way comparable to Ixion (1294-1298), and continuously contemplates the prospect of suicide (1146-52, 1241, 1247, 1255-310).⁴⁹ Indicative of his deathlike status is also his reaction to Theseus' arrival. Heracles veils his head (1159, 1199), calling to mind the image of his children dressed up in funeral garments.⁵⁰ This action not only signals his transformation from the wearer of the lion skin and the crown of the victor to a weak and defenseless figure,⁵¹ but also stresses his current status as a “mort-vivant”, for the veiling covers the hero in darkness (1159, 1216-7). The ritual connotations of the veiling reinforce the idea of Heracles' symbolic death.⁵² Iconography depicts the hero seated and veiled in the course of his initiation at Agrai.⁵³ This phase of the initiatory ritual seems to correspond to the stage of liminality or virtual death that the initiate undergoes before his re-aggregation and rebirth into a new status.

⁵⁰ See Worman (n. 24), 94. The veiling occurs also in E. Supp. 111 (Adrastus) and 286-7 (Aithra) as an expression of grief.

⁵¹ See e.g. Worman (n. 24), 94-7.

It should be noted that Heracles embodies the spatial liminality of a katabatic hero, and scenic elements are used to highlight this idea. The corpses of Megara and the children as well as the pillar to which the character is tied serve as visual representations of a ruined oikos, both in its physical meaning ("building") and in its abstract sense ("family").⁵⁴ Heracles may be staged among the human and inhuman remnants of his house, but his place within the family structure is ironically non-existing, as non-existing is the oikos itself. His isolation is absolute, as he is also excluded from the broader social group (1279-98, 1161-2). The use of the ekkuklema underlines the spatially abnormal status of Heracles, as it places him in a liminal place in the intersection of what Rehm has identified as three distinct theatrical spaces – the "before", the "behind", and the "beyond".⁵⁵ In fact, this device conventionally brings to the theatrical "before" the result of events that are unfolded in the interior of the house or else the "behind" of the performance, while in the context of this play it also contributes to the visualisation of an onstage Underworld, the theatrical "beyond".

This last deathlike experience of Heracles is different from his previous ones. Heracles the all-powerful mythical hero gives way to Heracles the man, as Euripides now discloses the weak and more human side of the protagonist. The destruction of his family brings about his own destruction. In a way, the scene that follows the infanticide functions as a foil to the initial episodes of the play; just as the family reproduced symbolically Heracles' infernal journey, so Heracles now shares the family's contact with death. His successful return to life will no longer derive from his extraordinary individualistic power, but rather from his philia-bond with Theseus. In this second part, therefore, Euripides presents us with an alternative way of facing and then conquering death.

HERACLES' SECOND "ANODOS"

Although the full recovery of Heracles will occur outside the dramatic time and space, when he arrives at his new home in Athens, there exist elements that attest to his second symbolic return to life. This symbolic rebirth, as already pointed out, is not achieved by Heracles' extraordinary physical power, but rather by the mediation of the reciprocal bonds of philia that he establishes with Theseus. Heracles' first contact with life and gradual transformation begin with the act of his unveiling (1202, 1203-4, 1214-5, 1226-7, 1231). That it is Theseus who insists on the performance of this action indicates that this unexpected visitor will play a role comparable to the returning Heracles in the first part of the play – he will expel the notion of death and replace it with that of life. The uncovering of the head exposes Heracles to the sun (1231, cf. 1203-4), just as the tearing of the funeral garments exposed the children to light (562-4). On the basis of the light/darkness antithesis in this play, such an act can be interpreted as a symbolic return to life.

This symbolic return brings about the reconsideration and renewal of Heracles' heroism. Several elements subvert the previous image of the independent and self-sufficient hero, attributing to him qualities that are more peculiar to human nature. For instance, as opposed to the outcome of his mythical katabasis that exalted his divine birth, his new deathlike experience uncovers his mortality;⁵⁶ he is repeatedly characterised as θνητός (1197, 1232, 1320, cf. 1227), declares defeat by Hera (1253, 1303-07), rejects his divine origin (1263-5),⁵⁷ pits himself against the Olympians (1242-3, 1303-10), and by advocating the idea of the perfect divinity (1340-6)⁵⁸ he dismisses the very foundation of his semi-divine birth, namely their illicit love-affairs. Also, the tradition of his apotheosis gives way to a more attainable sort of immortality: although he will die (1331), the Athenians will honour him with sacrifices and massive temples of stone (1331-33). Under these new circumstances, Heracles asks Theseus's help in bringing Cerberus back to Argos (1386-8)⁵⁹ and expresses his willingness to “submit to chance” (τῇ τύχῃ δουλευτέον, 1357).⁶⁰ More relevant to our discussion is the fact that this renewed perception of heroism goes hand in hand with a renewed

⁵⁶ For the prevalence of Heracles' mortal nature in the second part of the play see Gregory (n. 14), 271-2; Silk (n. 14), 14-6.

⁵⁷ On the tension between Amphitryon and Zeus in this play see Gregory (n. 14), 261-2.

⁵⁸ As Papadopoulou (n. 6), 85-116 rightly notes, Heracles does not reject the existence of the traditional gods (contra S.E. Lawrence, ‘The god that is truly god and the universe of Euripides' Heracles’, Mnemosyne 51 (1998), 129-46), but he reacts to their morality, which no longer meets the standards of their nature. See also Gregory (n. 14), 273-4. On the potential meta-theatrical dimension of this statement see Griffiths (n. 30), 96-7.

⁵⁹ For the different interpretations of this request see J.F. Johnson, ‘Compassion and Friendship in Euripides' Heracles’, CB 78 (2002), 115-29, at 124 n. 40.

attitude toward death. In fact, Heracles' declaration ἐγκατερήσω θάνατον ("I shall await death steadfastly", 1351),⁶¹ which actually subverts his previous assertion ἐκπονήσω θάνατον, implies that the hero sees death from another perspective.⁶² The notion of "labour" is now absent. Heracles will no longer engage in a fight against Death as part of his glorious achievements, but will rather await him steadfastly. This declaration suggests that Heracles modifies his stance on human limitations. If his return from the world of the dead reflected his breach of the limits on humankind, waiting patiently for death now reflects his awareness of those limits. This reconsidered perception forms the basis for his new collaborative approach to life and creates a sharp contrast with the lone bowman figure in the agon earlier on.

Reciprocity and interdependence also form part of Heracles' attitude toward his family. We have seen that, while in the first part of the play the family's fate was tightly dependent on the hero's actions, the terms are now reversed. The link he draws between the destruction of his relatives and his own destruction (1374, 1389-93) shows explicitly enough that it is the former's death that accounts for his new deathlike experience. Thus, he manages to recover and reverse his deathlike state only when he is "unyoked" (κάποζεύγνυμαι, 1375) from his family and puts on the new "yoke" of philia with Theseus (cf. ζεῦγός γε φίλιον, 1403). Theseus will be henceforth regarded as his surrogate son, taking the place of his dead children (1401). The reciprocal dynamics of this new human bond, as well as the character of Heracles' redefined heroism, is registered in the staging of the hero's exit and, more precisely, in the physical contact it involves; Theseus offers his hand to Heracles (1398) and puts the arm of his friend around his neck (1402).⁶³ The leaning on Theseus, the co-fighter and the son, exemplifies the reciprocity and interdependence involved in the philia bond, which makes possible another dimension of heroism.⁶⁴

CONCLUSION

It was not my intention to assert that the only way to read the play is through the katabatic motif it involves. Nor did I attempt to apply a reading that differs substantially from what most scholars accept as the "mainstream" reading of the play. I agree that Euripides redefines Heracles' heroic identity and explores a different type of heroism which is based on the principle of reciprocity and is undoubtedly closer to the standards of ordinary human nature. However, the above analysis proves that the katabasis offers additional and richer interpretative possibilities, impacting on ways of seeing and thinking in the play. In the first part, it brings out the growth of Heracles' heroic excellence insofar as it serves as proof of his ultimate achievement. Through his infernal visit and return the hero contacts death and manages to triumph over it. At the same time, the motif serves as a backdrop against which Heracles' family undergoes a similar deathlike experience before experiencing a symbolic rebirth once the hero returns to his homeland. However, at Lyssa's arrival the notion of death reappears and pervades the offstage episode of infanticide. The same spirit characterises most of the second part of the play. Heracles undergoes another, much more arduous, deathlike experience, in which the triumph over death is achieved not by means of extraordinary power and supernatural courage, but rather through the bond of philia and the human reciprocity it involves.
